Green Tip of the Week

Now That's Cookin'!

What would summer be without barbecues, picnics, and spur-of-the-moment meals eaten outdoors? Take the "heat" out of summer cooking with these simple ideas:

- Take advantage of the summer's garden-fresh produce to whip up salads and other side dishes that require little or no cooking energy.
- If you barbecue frequently at home, consider replacing your charcoal grill with an electric one. Electric grills generate far fewer air pollutants than burning charcoal, or even propane gas.
- Choose meals that don't need to be reheated to be enjoyed as leftovers.
- When buying an outdoor grill, choose one that also has a burner feature. You'll be able to cook as well as grill outside, helping to keep your kitchen cool and minimize indoor air conditioning needs.
- When hosting friends at your house, use reusable or biodegradable cups and encourage recycling of cans and bottles.
- Encourage guests to bike or carpool to your event.
- Fill up pitchers of water and other beverages instead of buying individual portions.
- Buy organic and locally grown vegetables and meat as often as possible.

Tips if using a charcoal grill:

- Apply the minimum amount of lighter fluid (which contributes to air pollution) to ignite the charcoal.
- Use lump brands of charcoal made from invasive tree species or harvested from sustainably managed forests over briquettes, as these may contain coal dust or other additives as binders.

- Use a chimney starter to eliminate use of lighter fluid altogether. These metal cylinders are filled with charcoal and lit on fire using the aid of scrap paper at the bottom. Once the entire column of charcoal is lit, dump the charcoal onto your grill for a more eco-friendly barbeque.
